WHO'S TRAINING YOU?

Mairin Plew has been training PRIDE for almost a year now, usually in Genesee County, but her journey with foster care started long before. Mairin was raised in a foster home, but she was not a foster child. Having had an extremely tragic childhood, Mairin felt inspired to help children with experiences like hers. She and her husband were foster parents for several years before taking a break. Last year, they re-opened their license and Mairin applied to become a PRIDE trainer. Having been recently licensed herself, she is in a unique position to walk alongside the families she trains.

Mairin is a full-time foster parent as a group home provider. With seven children ranging from ages 1 to 10, Mairin is always on her toes. She and her husband have taken individual placements, but their heart is in keeping siblings together. As biological parents, legal guardians, and foster care providers, Mairin and her husband have helped raise a total of twenty-three children. Her ability to integrate twenty-five years of parenting experience into PRIDE trainings, sharing successes and failures, is part of what makes her such an asset to the training team. Mairin feels it is extremely important for foster parents to support one another. She shares that even with all of her experience, she still relies on others for advice, recommendations, and support in general.

Mairin advises, "The licensing process can feel overwhelming at times, but I can promise that if you stay the course, every single child you help will be worth it."

BECOME A TRAINER

We're looking for foster parents to join our PRIDE training team! Our foster parent trainers are personable and energetic, great storytellers and effective communicators. Parent trainers are contracted employees and can expect to work about 20-25 hours per month in the county of your choice, but foster parents who choose to train in multiple counties have an opportunity to work more hours. Trainers are expected to be currently or formerly licensed and must have a high school diploma. Trainers are also required to attend a paid four-day training to learn more about PRIDE content and classroom management skills. If you believe your experiences would benefit others, apply at:

FAMILY FEATURE

Denise and Jim Davies call themselves “seasoned”, and after 13 years of fostering, who wouldn’t? What began as a journey to adopt their biological grandson has grown into a very busy household with two adopted children and four foster children. Denise and Jim Davies have built a strong support network of family, friends, and community resources over the years and encourages others to do the same.

WE’RE ALL HUMAN

Being “seasoned” means Denise receives calls from workers and other foster families, seeking advice or a listening ear. During trainings and seminars, Denise tells other parents she meets to give her a call if they have any questions. Remembering what it was like when she first began fostering and didn’t have a large support network, she wants to be a source of support. Denise often offers families resources, suggestions, or contact information to connect with other foster parents who have been going through the same things. She shares that everyone has fears and reservations about taking a new placement, and she is no different since you never know what to expect.

The challenges of the unknown are one of the reasons Denise says that fostering is hard work and you must be dedicated. When discussing past placements, Denise shared, “I’ve had hard ones and I’ve had easy ones. It’s difficult because I’ve had kids that have knocked me on the floor, and I’ve had kids that cry and you have to reassure them a lot because they think you’re not coming back because that’s what they’ve known.” Denise adds that when fostering, you have to give an abundance of love. Over the years, she has learned how important it is that each child—biological, adoptive, and foster—gets the same amount of love and no one feels neglected, so she works diligently to find new and fun ways to help them believe that someone cares.

Denise shared a personal experience about children placed with her who were getting speech therapy one day a week through school. Because she felt that one day a week was not effective, she enrolled them in speech therapy outside of school two additional days a week, and the children thrived. According to Denise, people have the wrong view of foster parents if they think about fostering as a way to get rich, as they definitely spend more on the children than they receive from the daily rate. “You have to treat [foster children] like your own kids and make them feel a part of the family,” she says.

For the Davies family, treating children in foster care like part of the family often means that they are a part of the family even after reunification. Denise shared that many of their former foster children still call her “mom”, invite them to football games or plays and share school pictures. In addition, many birth parents who reunite with their children include the Davies family as an extended family of sorts, appreciating that their kids were so loved while they were apart.

*“Don’t give up on the kids.
The kids didn’t do anything wrong; it’s going to be hard,
but don’t give up.”*

– Denise Davies

TEEN TALK

While trying to get teens to open up can feel daunting, building a deep and consistent connection can help. BESTLIFE has compiled a list of tips to do just that. Some of our favorites are:

- Avoid asking "why" questions.
Instead, ask them how or what they felt about what happened.
- Ask what friends are doing and feeling.
While your teen may not experience the same things as their friends, this still provides great insight into their world.
- Talk about a time you made a mistake.
Sharing about mistakes made and lessons learned can provide a great sense of relatability to teens.
- Ask unexpected questions.
Branch out from "How was school?" with specific questions such as, "What's something that made you laugh today?"
